WE DEDICATE THIS BOOK

Admired and respected for his fighting spirit, intellectual honesty, and good judgment, he is an outstanding leader in the field of retailing and a teacher whose genuine good heartedness and sincere willingness to help others win the affection of all with whom he comes in contact.

On the Importance of Being Tough-Minded

WILLIAM JAMES, a great teacher of philosophy at Harvard during the early years of this century, made the useful distinction between people who are "tough-minded" and people who are "tender-minded." These terms have nothing to do with levels of ethical conduct; the "toughness" referred to is "toughness" of the intellectual apparatus, hardihood of the spirit, not "toughness" of the heart. The tough-minded have a zest for experience; they dare to grapple with the unfamiliar and wrest useful truth from stubborn new facts; they do not wall themselves in with comfortable illusions.

For two years the Business School has tried to make you tough-minded. We have forced you to acquire knowledge by the hard route of the case method instead of the easy route of the text book and the lecture. We have expected you to dig things out for yourselves, because we wanted you to develop power; because we wanted you to understand that education is a process of drawing out the student's mind, not of pouring in the instructor's ideas. If we have been at all successful in this undertaking, you are not under the illusion that the Business School provides you with any body of specific knowledge, any set of formulae, any ready-cut pattern of behavior that will enable you to go out into the world of business and be successful administrators; on the contrary, you are aware that the principal value of your professional training at the Business School lies in the power you have developed to analyze a situation, to work out a program of action, and to carry that program into effect.

All this means that the Business School has given you the initial impetus toward being tough-minded. But you have to keep it up after you leave the School; for the rigorous discipline of the School's training you have to substitute your own discipline. What are some of the characteristics of the tough-minded professional business administrator? There are three which I think are important for you, as graduates of the Harvard Business School.

In the first place, if you are really tough-minded, you won't look for the easy job. Some jobs offer an easy transition from school to business, because they involve the making of analyses, the giving of advice, opinion, and criticism, without the responsibility of carrying out the action recommended. These jobs look attractive, but they frequently prove to be blind alleys because they do not build the necessary qualities of disciplined leadership. Don't start with this kind of job when you leave the School. Instead, look for an active job in the front line trenches of business, even though it may not be strictly a white collar job. You can be an "expert" later.

In the second place, if you are really tough-minded you won't be looking for the easy answers. Business problems don't lend themselves unflinching to one simple right method of analysis which inevitably arrives at the one and only correct answer. If knowledge of a few formulae and ability to manipulate a slide rule were enough to produce the right answers in business, then you may be sure that the demand for really good business executives would not so greatly exceed the supply. Business can hire plenty of average-grade technicians who can figure the right answers to the problems that lend themselves to exact routines and procedures. Business, by and large, does not pay a very high price for that kind of ability. What business does pay a premium for, and what the business community vitally needs, are qualities of judgment and leadership. You can't develop those qualities if you are looking for the easy answers. To over-simplify the world they live in is a favorite device of the tender-minded.

Finally, if you are really tough-minded, you won't always try to play it safe. You will cultivate qualities of initiative and venturesomeness. You will not be afraid to act, even if you have to act on imperfect knowledge, for you will realize that all knowledge is imperfect and experimental rather than final. You will not be afraid to take chances. It is a mistake to think that the proper use of a Business School training is to enable you to avoid all risks. You can never hope to make a perfect budget of income, expense, and profit; if you think you are doing so you are probably playing too safe. The essence of profit in a changing world is risk and uncertainty. Your objective should be not the avoidance of risk, but the intelligent assumption of risk. Today, more than ever, it is more—not less—risk-taking that American business vitally needs. Don't use your Business School training to seek a stodgy, conservative safety, because, paradoxically, when all business tries to play it safe there is no safety for any business. Professional training for business administration is successful only if it produces a goodly number of men with a genius for risk-taking and a capacity for leadership. You have heard much in recent years to the effect that the doors of opportunity are rapidly being closed in this country. I want to say to you as earnestly as I can that if there are any doors of opportunity being closed in this country, they are not doors of the environment, they are doors of the human spirit. If you are tough-minded you will use your Business School training to open those doors, not to close them.

The Dean's Message

Students of the Harvard Business School:

Within the last one hundred and fifty years, a comparatively short period in the span of history, this country has been transformed from a vast wilderness into the greatest industrial civilization the world has ever known. By its very nature, the sudden development of our great industrial organizations has involved the element of change—change in the ways of living and thinking, in the kinds of work, and in the complexion of social groups. Scientific discoveries and technological progress, the catalyzers of our industrial system, possess the inherent elements of disorganizing force. In the society of their creation, our business leaders have been masters at technocracy, but many of them have been apprentices at human relations.

I believe it is clear that if we are to preserve our traditional system of free enterprise in a future which is clouded by the reality of war, the business men of our nation must present to the country a new kind of leadership. They must recreate the bases for stability by intelligent administrative action based upon an understanding of the structure of society and the nature of human beings.

It is well that you men have taken time at the outset of your business career to study some aspects of the administrative problem confronting our business leaders, for in entering the profession you must accept this challenge: if our democracy is to be preserved in the face of constantly accelerating change, a greater sense of responsibility and a better and more permanent basis for human collaboration must be developed.

These things are particularly important when the nation faces the threat of war.

HARVARD BUSINESS SCHOOL

Harvard Graduate School of Business Administration A Brief History

Condensed from an Historical Sketch by Dean Wallace B. Donham and Assistant Dean Esty Foster

BUSINESS TRAINING was under consideration at Harvard as early as 1885, but it was almost fifteen years later before this vague possibility developed into a probability. In 1900 Accounting was added to the curriculum of the Economics Department, and soon proved its effectiveness. In 1902 plans were laid for a School of Political Science and Administration. The development of these plans was achieved by 1907, and funds were to be raised to establish a "Graduate School of Public Service and Commerce." The panic of that year, however, put a damper on the undertaking.

But the idea continued to exist, and in 1908 the Corporation voted "to establish a Graduate School of Business Administration." Yet unless funds were raised forthwith, the new School could not be opened in the fall as planned. Due to the generosity of Henry Lee Higginson, the entire sum necessary was underwritten by an "anonymous" donor. The first catalogue of courses was published August 1, 1908, and the School opened October 1 with 59 students and a programme designed for candidates for the new degree of Master in Business Administration.

To meet the immediate needs, as well as to effect a permanent solution through the training of teachers. The course was carefully planned in outline, and each topic of the syllabus assigned to an experienced business man; a teacher on the staff then organized instruction and set the examinations.

About 1911, through the generosity of A. W. Shaw, a fund was established to be known as the Shaw Fund for Business Research. From this early beginning the Harvard Bureau of Business Research was developed, with the purpose of making detailed studies of various industries in order to obtain teaching material.

NINETEEN FORTY-ONE YEARBOOK

In June, 1913, after a five-year experimental period, the Business School was separated from the Faculty of Arts and Sciences, and, as was fitting, took its place with the other graduate professional schools of the University.

By the years 1914-15 the growth of the School and the loyalty of its graduates and former students called for the information of the Harvard Business School Alumni Association, to weld this rapidly growing body of alumni together and to stimulate its cooperation.

After the War the growth of the School was rapid. The justification for business training from the students' point of view was greatly emphasized, due to a growing appreciation of the complexity of the business unit. In 1918-19 the enrollment was 159, the following year it passed 400, and in 1931-32, 1102 men were registered in the School. In 1919 the present Dean, Wallace B. Donham, took over his office.

The story of the campaign to raise $5,000,000 for buildings constitutes a fascinating chapter in the history of the School. How one generous benefactor, George Fisher Baker, told Bishop Lawrence that rather than give the "first" million he wanted to "do it alone" may be read in Bishop Lawrence's book, "Memories of a Happy Life."

The location selected for the George F. Baker Foundation was on the Boston side of the Charles River, opposite the freshman dormitories, and across North Harvard Street from Soldiers Field. The dedication of the Business School group constituting the Foundation took place on June 4, 1927 before a distinguished body of men gathered to do honor to the donor and his high purpose.

In the short span of twenty years an ideal of the socially responsible business man has been nurtured, to be implanted in successive generations of students leaving the School to enter the world of business, a career which President Lowell has described as "the oldest of the arts but the newest of the professions."

"Dreading to leave an illiterate Ministry to the Churches," the founders of New England established Harvard College. As Owen D. Young said at the dedication of the School Buildings, Harvard is now striving to guard against an illiterate ministry of business.

NINETEEN FORTY-ONE YEARBOOK

Many Thanks

The Editor wishes to express his most sincere thanks and appreciation to those who have helped in the production of this Yearbook.

The Editor regrets that he is unable to mention all of those who offered their assistance; space does not permit. However, he wishes to recognize particularly the sincere and unselfish assistance of

Miss M. C. Williams	Mrs. S. A. Kerr
Miss C. C. McCarthy	Mrs. F. E. Heard
Mr. R. F. Bingham	Miss E. B. McPhee
Miss E. L. Hawkins	Miss Helen B. Brett
Miss C. C. McAuliffe	Miss Barbara C. Mitchell
Miss M. E. Osgood	Miss Barbara H. Downs

The Editor is sincerely grateful to Mr. Ralph Doane of the Folsom Engraving Company, the engravers, to Mr. Paul Blanchard of the Warren Press, the printers, and to Mr. Irving Green of Sargent Studio, the photographers for their most appreciated cooperation and helpful suggestions in the planning of the book.

To Mr. William Hilton, the Business Manager, and to Mr. Joe Jessup, the Advertising Manager, the Editor is greatly indebted and deeply appreciative of the excellent job they have done. It has been a pleasure and an honor to work with both of these gentlemen in the production of this book.

The Editor further extends his thanks to his room-mate and neighboring classmates for their candid opinions and assistance in carrying out the perfunctory duties of this job.

The Yearbook Committee wishes next year's Editor and Staff the best of luck and every success.

Photographs of Professors Doriot, Larson, Sprague, Lewis and Mc Nair are by Bachrach.

A WINTRY DAY

We appreciate . . .

- YOUR PATRONAGE throughout these past months, for once again it indicates that the 1940-41 Business School students, like those of former years, continue to regard the University Theatre as a primary source of entertainment, relaxation and genuine pleasure.
- YOUR RESPONSE to the outstanding array of motion picture programs which we are currently showing and will present in the future . . . recognition of the fact that the University, through its ability to select its pictures from the output of all of the major producers, offers programs which, week in and week out, are unexcelled by any theatre in the country.
- YOUR ENCOURAGEMENT for us to continue to make the University the popular choice of those who desire and expect the finest in motion picture entertainment presented in an atmosphere of refinement, congeniality and good fellowship.
